Step 1: Identify What Type Of Writer's Block You Have \t#Examine variety of writing block options for how to know if you have writer's block Writer's block is a complex subject which affects different writers differently. In fact, the only thing writers have in common is that they all have writer's block. For this reason, it's hard to pinpoint a one-size-fits-all treatment plan. That being said, there are a few broad approaches to writer's block treatment which can be adapted to the various forms of the condition. The first step is to identify what type of writer's block you have. There are two main types of writer's block: #Reasons for not writing a blog post The first type of writer's block is known as "Writer's Block." Which is when you can't seem to come up with any good ideas for a blog post. In this case, your mind might be clear and your thought process is working properly. You just can't seem to find the right thing to say. #Reasons for not writing a blog post \tThe second type of writer's block is often called "Editor's Block." This occurs when you find yourself stuck with too many ideas, or no ideas at all.
